I am concerned about the car park at Headland Park. Having more car parks in the city just encourages people to drive and there will never be enough car spaces for the people who want to use them. If people know there is a car park at Headland Park they are more likely to drive as it is always the easiest way to get around in Sydney.

The main reason the inner areas of Sydney are such attractive places to live is that they were designed before cars became popular and so are designed for people not cars. Bringing cars into the city will destroy any character left in these areas. I can understand that there should be somewhere for disabled people to park but no one else.
